In Berlin, probably the most vibrant city in Europe right now, a guide to the infamous nightlife may be more valuable than someone to show you the impressive sights by day. Henrik Tidefjard gravitated to the city from his native Sweden due to its openness and creative, artistic energy, speaks four languages (Swedish, English, German, Spanish) and knows and can access all the secret club doors. Some are located in subway tunnels, abandoned factories, former government buildings of the GDR, bank vaults, old power stations, etc., many stay open all night and involve various degrees of scandalous behavior—this is Berlin, after all. To gain strength for the nightcrawling, he might start off at one of Berlin's increasingly sophisticated new restaurants—a recent favorite was Volt, also located in a former power station in Kreuzberg and featuring a creative, pan-European menu. 350 Euros for 3 1/2 hours—more if you decide to go on all night. henrik@berlinagenten.com, <http://www.berlinagenten.com/>
